Osaka-Castle

This huge castle was built as a symbol of the authority of Toyotomi Hideyoshi. It was burned down during the summer campaign of the Siege of Osaka. The keep, which was rebuilt by Tokugawa lemitsu, later burned down again after being struck by lightning. The current keep was rebuilt in 1931 atop a stone wall from the Edo-era and was financed with citizen donations. The inside is a museum where important cultural properties and other precious historic documents are placed on display.

Sakai Traditional Crafts Museum

🛲 By Public Transport

Main Attractions

Sakai city was once named "Venice of the East," flourishing as one of Japan's leading trading/international cities. In the medieval period, people, information and money gathered in Sakai from all over the world, leading to the formation of much culture, including the tea ceremony, incense sticks, and Japanese-style sweets.

A saying that "Everything starts from Sakai" was created because so many of Japan's first items and techniques and so much of its culture came from Sakai.

The manufacturing technologies of blades and bicycle parts, which play active roles throughout the world; and kelp products, which are indispensable to Japanese tables, have all been passed down to the present day as traditional industries from Sakai then, the center of commerce and industry in Japan.
