

Fire-resistant architecture

Hakodate suffered many devastating fires during the Meiji era (1868–1912). To prevent further destruction of property, building with fire-resistant construction materials, such as stone, brick, and reinforced concrete, were put into use. These materials and the buildings made with them have supplemented traditional Japanese fire-resistant storerooms (kura).