

Imamiya Shrine

Imamiya Shrine enshrines the souls of three emperors who unsuccessfully rebelled against the Kamakura shogunate and were punished severely for their actions. In 1221, the retired emperor Gotoba (1180–1239) attempted to restore power to the imperial house by overthrowing the Kamakura shogunate, the first warrior-led government in Japan. Establishment of the shogunate in 1192 had left the court in Kyoto virtually powerless and the aristocracy resentful. The rebellion, however, failed to win samurai support and was quickly put down.

Gotoba was assisted by his sons, the retired emperor Tsuchimikado (1196–1231) and Emperor Juntoku (1197–1242), and all three were banished from Kyoto. They were sent into exile and died without ever seeing the capital again. In medieval Japan, it was believed that the spirits of those who had suffered injustice in life could come back to avenge those who had wronged them. Imamiya Shrine was built here in 1247 to appease the spirits of these three emperors.
